

Envisioning Change

How do we know, here in America, what is happening in the rest of the world- and particularly in places of great unrest? Journalist and cameramen go into these volatile situations and deliver this information to us, while we sit in the safety of our homes. Kathy Eldon's son, Dan, was 23 and one of Reuter's youngest photographers in the summer of 1993. He was stationed in Somalia where in July of that year, he and three other journalists were stoned to death while covering an uprising.

How does a mother live through such a life-changing tragedy? Kathy, with her daughter Amy, began Creative Visions Foundation in memory of Dan. This nonprofit raises money to fund documentaries, films, television series and other projects that inform, inspire and empower audiences to take action. Since Dan's death, his life and belief in the "power of one" has inspired countless individuals to positively impact the world around them.

If media is the vehicle for the messages that we receive, then it's critically important to support media that's telling the important stories- climate change, humanitarian issues, and social and economic issues. Donating to Creative Visions Foundation is one way in which you can support individuals in harm's way for the hope of a better world.
